

s Zayd grew older, school became harder instead of easier. Every morning, his mother handed him a glass of water and three tablets before sending him to school.

Some children noticed.

Soon, whispers became laughter.

"Weird...Slow...Disabled."

"He has to take medicine."

Zayd pretended not to hear them.

He was trying his best. He really was.

Most lessons felt like puzzles with missing pieces.

While his classmates memorised the answers, Zayd couldn't.

His mind always searched for one thing first. "Why?"

During Islamic Studies, his teacher showed the class a picture of the Kaabah. A large black cube.

Thousands of people walking around it.

Everyone understood. Except Zayd.

"What does it mean? Why do we face it when we pray?"

"If Allah is everywhere, why do we turn towards one place?"
