

he more he learned...the more questions he had.
Months passed before he finally understood.
Not because he refused to learn...
but because he could never remember something until he understood its meaning.

One afternoon, his mother was called to school. His teacher spoke kindly.
"Perhaps Zayd should repeat Form One." After a pause, she quietly added,
"Or maybe PPKI would be more suitable."

His mother looked at her son. Then she smiled.
"I know my child. He learns differently. But he will learn."

That evening, instead of giving up on him...
she searched for a tuition class. And then another.

Because sometimes...
the greatest gift a child receives...
is someone who refuses to stop believing in them.
