

“Some believe they are better because of their family.
Some because of money.
Some because of skin colour.
Some because of intelligence.
Some because they are healthy.
Some because another person struggles.
The material changes—
But pride always sounds the same.”

Zayd fell silent, feeling the crushing weight of the truth.
Sometimes, he had listened to that very same voice
inside himself: pride.

After years of enduring bullying and discrimination,
he had erected a fortress around his heart.
Yet, in his quietest moments, he questioned whether that wall was truly a defense mechanism—or merely a way to savor the thrill of defeating those so-called superior people.