

ayd woke up to a room that felt like a tangled reflection of his own mind: cluttered, noisy, and chaotic.

Unfinished sketches were scattered across his desk like abandoned dreams, and a half-read book lay facedown on the rug.

At twelve, Zayd often felt like he was running a race where the finish line kept moving.

Every half-started project felt like a promise he couldn't keep.